Student having financial issues

If a student indicates that they are going to have to withdraw from school for financial reasons they should:

Advisors may want to ask the student:

- What is the primary concern? Lack of financial aid? Working a lot to pay bill? Lack of support from family?
- Has the student met with financial aid or the business office?
- Has the student considered, or would they like to consider, taking some time off to work on their financial situation? Advisors can help review a path to graduation and what impact taking a semester off would have on the student’s progress.

*The Center for Student Success or Student Affairs can also serve as an advocate for students who are having financial difficulty. Students often find it useful to meet with an advocate from one of those areas and develop a plan for how they should work with financial aid or the business office.
